

Team Pitch Framework

Use this structure for any conversation where you want someone to join the Bookless team.

STEP 1 — OPEN ON THEM

Acknowledge what they're already doing

Start with what they're already good at — tutoring, making content, knowing a subject, helping students. Don't pitch Bookless first. The opening line should make them feel like this conversation is about them, not you.

EXAMPLE OPENER

"You're already doing X. You already know this course / this space. I want to talk about doing that in a way that reaches more people."

Swap X for whatever is true about that person. Tutor, content maker, student rep — adapt it.

STEP 2 — THE PITCH

What Bookless is – in under 30 seconds

Bookless is organized course material — properly written notes, step by step, delivered through Slack. Each topic connects to the next. Students work through it together in small channels.

The problem it fixes: university notes are scattered and disconnected. Students spend more time hunting for material than actually studying it.

PROOF IT'S REAL

- Website is live — bookless.framer.ai
- Courses running: Strategic Management and Treasury Management (ZCAS)
- Material is built and posted — this is not an idea, it's already going

STEP 3 — THE ROLE

What you actually need from them

Be specific about the role — vague invitations don't land. People say yes to a clear thing, not to "being part of something."

COMMON ROLE TYPES

- Subject expert / content partner — knows the course, reviews and shapes the lessons
- Course tutor — runs Q&A; sessions or office hours inside the Slack community
- Demand / outreach — gets the word out on campus, WhatsApp groups, student circles

Pick one role per person. Don't offer everything — it reads as unclear.

STEP 4 — THE UPSIDE

What they get out of it

Be honest. This is early. Don't oversell — it damages trust immediately.

- Income share as the student base grows — not a flat fee that resets
- Early position means they own a piece of what gets built, not a role that can be replaced later
- Their work turns into a product that keeps running — not session-by-session

If they push for exact numbers, give the model: X students at Y per month, their share is Z%. Real numbers, not promises.

STEP 5 — THE ASK

One thing. Low commitment. See if it works.

Don't ask for a big commitment in the first conversation. Ask for one small, clear thing and deliver on it. That builds trust faster than any pitch.

HOW TO CLOSE

"Start with one course / one task. We do that one thing well and see how it feels. If it makes sense, we go further. If it doesn't, nothing is lost."

HANDLE THESE

Questions they will ask

"How much money is this?"

Give the model, not a promise. Tell them what a student pays, how many students are in now, and what a realistic near-term number looks like. Don't invent a salary. Tell them it grows with the platform.

"How much time does this take?"

Be specific. Content review is a few hours per step. Tutoring is one session per week if they want it. Don't say "not much" — give an actual number they can plan around.

"Is this just your idea or is it actually running?"

Point them to the website and the active courses. Two courses are live, material is posted. That's the answer.

"Who else is involved?"

Be honest about where you are. Say you're building the team now and that's why you're talking to them. Don't pretend there's a team if there isn't one yet.

"Why me specifically?"

This is the most important one. Have a real answer — not "because you're good at studying" but because of something specific they do that the platform needs right now. That's what makes them say yes.
